The toxins which developed after transplantation were comparable to a spectrum at one end of which were the homoiotoxins and at the other an absence of toxins after autotransplantation, the various lengths of syngencsiotoxins forming the center. The behavior of lymphocytes, fibroblasts, and vessels toward the syngencsiotoxins represented a reaction on the part of different tissues to the same kind of chemical agency. However, the reaction of the fibroblasts and vessels occurred only when the syngencsiotoxins were produced in such a quantity that the effect became apparent within the first twelve days after transplantation, while the reaction of the lymphocytes sometimes became marked at a late date in cases in which at an early period after transplantation the syngencsiotoxins were not yet sufficiently strong to call forth the fibroblast and vascular reaction. With certain exceptions which were indicated in this paper, both reactions ran a parallel course. It appeared probable that with the progress of time the syngenesiotoxins collected in increasing strength within the transplanted or neighboring tissue and thus brought about the delayed reaction. Preliminary results obtained in multiple syngenesioplasic transplantations indicated that the syngenesio-and homoiotoxins were of a complex character and that a further analysis of the syngenesiotoxins and homoiotoxins might be accomplished by cross transplantations. From the agreement between the results obtained previously by syngenesiotransplantation into the rat and the results of these experiments on the guinea pig it appears probable that the findings have a general...
